"Knowing Nature's Knowledge"

The auditorium at Sanford University was filled to capacity. Guests were standing in the aisles to listen to this debate. Reporters from the two leading news syndicates of the country were also present. Professor Herman Gettler, exponent of Life according to Nature, was a big six footer. His friendly brown eyes and engaging smile always made friends quickly. His opponent, Dr. Jessard Simpson, exponent of the Machine Age, was a thin nervous type of man. He wore thick eye-glasses and could speak a mile a minute.

"For centuries," concluded Professor Gettler, "man had to get his living directly from nature. He learned to solve her secrets and was happy. I maintain that even today it is possible for a civilized man to become a child of nature. Transport an intelligent man into the jungles and he will not die of starvation if he knows nature. For natural food is plentiful in most jungles if you know where to look for it and are able to distinguish between the edible and the poisonous. Most wild animals won't bother you unless you bother them. As for the chance of being bitten by a poisonous snake there is more danger of being struck by lightning right in this city than a snake biting you. Actually there are no poisonous snakes in Polynesia and in Malaysia they are rare."

The professor walked away from the microphone and Dr. Simpson made his concluding remarks.

"The man of yesterday was a child. He was frightened because nature controlled him. The man of today has turned this world into one run by mechanical slaves for his benefit. Machines carry us; they furnish our food; they help us in our daily work. Without them we can't exist. The so-called child of nature is o.k. provided he still can turn in an emergency to the comforts of our modern society. Drop him into nature's jungle and he couldn't survive!"

There was a question and answer period for the next half hour. Then Bill Stieger of the Consolidated News Service sprung the simple challenge.

"You two could argue until the end of time and never come to any conclusion. Why not put all of this to a simple test. I challenge you, Professor Gettler, to go into an unknown jungle. See if you can survive and be as healthy and strong as you are now. But while you praise nature, you live in a large apartment house, drive an automobile, and have all the comforts of modern civilization."

The answer came as a shocker to the reporter, who for the moment thought he was having a bit of fun.

"Challenge accepted! You must come with me to report what happens. And also my worthy opponent, Dr. Jessard Simpson. I'll show you both how it can be done."

That story made the front pages of all newspapers. And a variety of offers came in to transport the men into an area but keep the locality a secret. However in case of a dreadful emergency, it was agreed that the reporter would have with him a small but powerful radio with which he could send a message for help.

The specially chartered transport plane was winging its way across the skies. The three men inside were watching the scenery below. Suddenly a lamp blinked. That was the signal for them to push a lever and open a side door on the plane. They hit the skies with their parachutes. The three men did just that. Bill Stieger and Professor Gettler landed safely on the ground. They looked up at a figure dangling from a tree.

"We'll have to cut his cords and free him from that tree," commented Stieger. "Dr. Simpson does look a bit funny up there. Maybe the monkeys will throw things at him."

It was a simple task to free the Dr. from the tree and soon the three men were free of their parachutes. It had been agreed that they could take sections of the material and the shrouds with them. The men walked for about two hours and made a dreadful discovery.

"We're back where we started from," noticed Bill Stieger. "What happened?"

"We just walked around in a circle," pointed out Dr. Simpson. "Remember we are strangers here. We have our pocket knives with us. Now let us make guide marks on the trees. We can also use stones. Thus we won't come back here. After all, if we are going to live in nature's paradise, we must use common sense."

The men walked for another two hours and then stopped. It was getting chilly.

"We should have a fire," declared Professor Gettler. "I'll make one."

He collected some small sticks and then looked for his cigarette lighter. He couldn't find it.

"Don't worry about making a fire," smiled Dr. Simpson. "I'll take care of it."

He looked for some soft wood and cut a section with his pocket knife. Then he cut a foot and a half length of fairly hard sapling about three eighths of an inch in diameter. He bore a cone shaped hole in the stick with his knife. For tinder, he scraped the fuzz from the bottom sides of palm leaves. Twirling the stick back and forth between the palm of his hands he soon had a fire going.

"Where in the world did you learn to make a fire that way?" asked the reporter.

"I was once a Boy Scout," admitted Dr. Simpson. "So don't kid yourselves. While I like, and want the comforts of modern civilization, I think I can live as well as anybody else according to nature."

"I'm getting hungry," admitted Professor Gettler. "Wonder what they're having for supper in that swell little place near the campus?"

"We are going to have roasted cashew nuts, then go to sleep," said Dr. Simpson.

The next morning the three men walked until they reached a stream that was teeming with fish. A net was made from the parachute cloth and soon the men were eating roasted fish.

"One important factor we must bear in mind in order to keep healthy," pointed out Professor Gettler, "is that we must have a varied diet."

"Correct," agreed Dr. Simpson. "I'm just watching those monkeys throwing things at each other and also eating different items. Whatever they can eat, so can we."

At the end of two weeks, the men were making nature supply them with food and shelter.

"My beard is growing," laughed Professor Gettler. "And I feel very happy. My ex-opponent, Dr. Simpson likes this kind of life."

"Why not?" snapped back the contented man. "No traffic problems here. That eliminates death and injury on the highway. No rushing back and forth to work. Gives us leisure time. Our problems are few and simple. So that does away with tension and fear. I'm convinced this turn to nature is wonderful. But our friend, the reporter seems to have something on his mind."

Bill Stieger forced a smile on his face and gave a short answer.

"I could do this the rest of my life."

"You can't fool me," observed Professor Gettler. "Something is on your mind. Out with it!"

"Well, if you must know," he confessed, "that special radio I have been carrying with me smashed when we landed! We can't contact the home base!"

"So they'll find us," pointed out Dr. Simpson. "They know where we dropped from the plane and we are still within that area. Why worry? Let's enjoy nature's bounty."

Two months passed and no sign of a rescue party had been observed. But the men didn't care. They felt healthier and their hearts and minds were at ease. And then about noon one day, they suddenly found themselves surrounded by a dozen ferocious looking dark skinned natives.

"If they are cannibals, then we are cooked," whined the reporter.

"I assumed you three gentlemen are the members of the nature party," said a man who was the chief with an Oxford accent. "We are your rescue party. But you certainly look fine and fit. Seems the signal went wrong and you jumped over an uncharted part of the country. The pilot hadn't the slightest idea where you landed. So eight searching parties have been out looking for you. Glad we found you. Though it seems you aren't so happy to get back to civilization."

And that is how the Simpson-Gettler-Stieger Institute of Living according to Nature got its start.

THE END
